1. Cultivating intercultural communicative competence through "Modern Communication English"	2016年09月- Present	The aim of this course is to develop students' ability to think critically about cross cultural issues, intercultural communication, and the transcultural nature of modern-day Japan. The course is also designed to encourage students to consider issues of culture, diversity, and identity from different perspectives, as they prepare for citizenship in an increasingly globalized world. This is achieved through class discussions, small group and whole class presentations, and independent research and analysis which challenge students to critically analyze their own assumptions and prior beliefs.
2. Language and culture for a globalized world (seminar)	2016年08月- Present	Adapted from the sociolinguistic content I taught at Meiji University, this seminar aims to foster productive global citizenship, which entails not only linguistic fluency, but also cultural fluency. Therefore, the primary goal of this seminar is to foster cultural fluency. Issues examined include: 1) The connection between language and cultural identity 2) Understanding how culture affects communication, and how language reflects and expresses culture 3) Developing an appreciation of intercultural communication skills and their importance in a globalized world 4) Examining the role of English as an international language and its political, social, and cultural consequences 5) Recognizing the value of indigenous languages and cultures, and the need to preserve linguistic diversity
3. Reading and writing as preparation for citizenship	2016年08月- Present	This course was designed to function not only as a language course, but also as a content course with the goal of equipping graduating students with critical thinking abilities necessary for productive citizenship. Real world, authentic topics are presented in class, and students research related topics, write reports on these topics, and present their findings and reflections in small group presentations and discussions. This requires them to analyze and critically reflect on societal issues both on a global and local level, and is geared towards producing socially responsible citizens who can function effectively in the 21st century.
4. Designed and implemented "English through popular songs" course	2011年09月2016年01月	This course utilized popular songs in English to enhance listening, speaking, reading, and writing. Since research indicates that learning language through music makes it easier to remember new words and expressions, a key focus of this course was the development of high-frequency vocabulary. There is a wealth of popular English songs, widely available in Japan, that are a rich source of natural, authentic, and colloquial English which is often unavailable in conventional textbooks. Popular songs also offer insights into the various cultures of the English-speaking world, and make language learning engaging and memorable. In addition to listening to and discussing lyrics of popular songs, participants practiced various pronunciations, experimented with tongue twisters, and tried out authentic vocabulary, idioms, and expressions. The course also included individual and group presentations to reinforce speaking skills.
5. Designed and implemented sociolinguistics content courses	2011年04月- Present	This course was originally designed to cater not only to Japanese students, but also to international students. It comprised part of Meiji University's

		"English Track" undergraduate degree program under the "Global 30" initiative. As a large lecture class, catering to a wide range of cultural backgrounds and English abilities, the lectures featured easy-to-understand powerpoint projects and extensive use of visual aids. Students were introduced to a variety of linguistic concepts including pragmatics and intercultural communication, as well as the impact of English as an international language. Further support was offered to students through the use of lecture outlines which served as a bridge to note-taking skills, which are required for students who study abroad following the course. Finally, each lecture included group discussion and tasks which require students to think deeply about the meaning of each topic and its implications for them personally.
6. A scaffolding approach to speech / presentation	2009年04月2016年01月	My speech and presentation course was structured so that students received small-group practice in presentation skills in the first half of the semester and knowledge about presentation organization and types in the second half of the semester. Small-group practice builds confidence for plenary presentations, and the emphasis was on peer feedback. The midterm and final presentations also incorporated audience evaluation and feedback, requiring presenters to consider their audience, while encouraging active listening. Scaffolding occurs as skills are built upon each other, and students' confidence increased as more was expected of them.
7. A step by step approach to preparing persuasive speeches	2009年04月2016年01月	To prepare students for delivering persuasive speeches, I have utilized a scaffolding approach that begins with persuasive speech practice. This was followed by instruction on researching and preparing persuasive speeches, including selection of three possible topics and possible persuasive claims for each. Students then surveyed their classmates to determine the potential for persuasiveness in relation to each topic before they finally selected their topic. They were also required to research sources in English, and discuss their topics in groups to get suggestions and input for their speeches. During the final presentations, all students completed an audience evaluation forms in which they stated whether or not they changed their opinions based on the presentation in question.
8. Speaking assessments by means of pair interviews	2008年04月2016年01月	In order to assess students' speaking progress, I utilized interviews based on the ACTFL Oral Proficiency Interview Format. These interviews incorporated a warm up, level check, probes, and wind-down. Students came to the interviews in pairs, the goal of which was to reduce anxiety, and to facilitate observation of their conversations. They were asked to prepare one conversation in advance, allowing me to assess their pronunciation and fluency. They then conducted spontaneous conversations, allowing me to observe their linguistic competence. Both conversations were based on linguistic and strategic skills covered in class.
9. Speaking assessments by means of group discussions	2008年04月2016年01月	Since language involves group discussions, and since one of the university's goals was to prepare students to study overseas, the dynamics of group discussions were also practiced and assessed. Students received instruction on introducing a topic; expressing opinions; agreeing and disagreeing; asking for clarification; soliciting feedback; taking turns; closing a discussion and moving onto another topic. They also learned to be group leaders, spokespersons, and recorders, and were assessed on these and linguistic competence by means of group discussions. The groups were chosen in advance, and each group prepared one topic ahead of time. During the final assessment, they also conducted spontaneous discussions based on randomly assigned topics.
10. Speaking assessments by means of presentations	2008年04月2016年03月	1st year students were introduced to the basics of giving presentations in English in order to prepare them for the speech / presentation class they would take in their 2nd year. They spent time in class studying sample speeches; brainstorming topics; learning how to structure a presentation; and practicing key language. They were required to ensure the

Global issues course that incorporated affective instructional techniques	2008年04月2012年01月 2008年04月- Present 2006年4月2007年1月 2006年06月2007年01月 2005年09月- Present 2005年09月2006年01月 2005年05月2002年07月	y had an introduction; body (with three main points) and conclusion. They also learned useful language for introductions, transitions and conclusions, and had opportunities to practice in pairs and small-groups multiple times before plenary presentations. All classmates filled in feedback forms to fulfill the dual purposes of active listening by the audience and consideration of the audience by the presenter. Assessing students by means of debate, in speaking classes, requires critical listening and spontaneous rebuttal, thereby providing an extra challenge for students. 1st year students were introduced to the structure of a debate speech, and useful expressions, and were then assigned to teams. Each team received two topics and prepared a "For" speech based on one and an "Against" speech based on the other. They then faced off in team debates and each team was required to prepare spontaneous rebuttals. Audience members also filled out feedback forms stating which teams "won" the debate and the reasons why. This was designed to encourage active listening on the part of the audience, but I did not select "winners" as I believe that all students who engage in debate (especially in a foreign language) are "winners". As writing develops in a recursive manner, every effort is made to empower students by facilitating metacognitive awareness of their learning, as well as providing many opportunities for peer feedback. Students are guided through several drafts of each paper, engage in peer and self editing, and discussion of their writing with their classmates. I have also held writing conferences with students in which I give them questions to reflect on in advance, and a conference response sheet as a follow up. When they submit their portfolios at the end of each semester, they can see the development in their own writing, and also submit a writing reflection sheet which gives them the opportunity to reflect on their strengths and needs. In this way, they utilize both intrapersonal and interpersonal intelligences as they develop as writers. Designed and implemented an EAP course on academic speaking for intermediate level students planning to study abroad. Emphasis was on tailoring the material to suit the needs of lower-level students by following a step-by-step, process based approach. This approach was adapted from Fujimori & Houck (2005) and utilized the following framework for teaching academic speaking skills: consciousness raising, knowledge building, and production development. I use participation cards in every class to give students a sense of empowerment and control over the learning process. In addition to helping me learn about the students, the cards are a means of constant feedback to and from students. There is a comments section that is a two way process, where both students and I can exchange comments. This allows them to understand my expectations and me to understand their needs and interests. It also provides a forum for "indirect" communication which is also designed to accommodate the cultural needs of students. This was part of an active research project that included an examination of the use of music in reducing learner anxiety, and increasing relevance and motivation in EFL listening tasks. This was part of a research project that examined Japanese students' concept of global citizenship and the possible role of the affective domain in enhancing Japanese global identity

4. Movie based worksheets	2009年08月	As part of the Meiji University Interfaculty Language Program, I prepared a series of worksheets based on movies to guide students through the movies, scene by scene. They included comprehension activities, vocabulary reinforcement, character / plot analysis, and listening practice. Also incorporated were pre- and post- activities for each scene to activate students' prior experiences and make the content more relatable.
5. Study Abroad (Student Textbook) (with Tsuji, K. & Tsuji, S.)	2009年04月	This textbook was designed for university students preparing to study abroad and offers both practice information and language skills to assist students on their first trip overseas.
6. Health and Fitness through English	2008年08月 - 2016	As part of the Meiji Interfaculty Language Program, I prepared a series of articles on health and fitness to provide the basis for group discussions in this content-based course. Key vocabulary and linguistic features were highlighted and students prepared questions and answers on the materials, which in turn inspired their own independent research. Students also prepared final presentations on health and fitness, which were given to the entire student body participating in the seminar.
7. Speaking assessment guidelines and evaluation rubrics for pair interviews, group discussions, presentations, and debates	2008年04月 - Present	In all classes, students receive guidelines regarding assessments, based directly on classroom instruction. The guidelines are also matched with assessment rubrics which students receive in advance. All rubrics are revised and customized each time they are used, to emphasize various skills and content areas.
8. Debate / discussion reinforcement worksheets	2006年4月
9. Popular music listening activities	2005年04月	I designed and implemented a series of EFL listening tasks based on popular songs to activate student interest and motivation, as well as to reduce anxiety and increase relevancy. The listening activities ranged in difficulty from essence to precise listening and song selection was determined by suitability, difficulty level, and student preferences.
